I'M SORRY YOU TAKE THAT ATTITUDE, MISS LANE -- IF YOU'D COOPERATED I WOULD HAVE PUT YOUR NAME ON THE MASTER LIST AS A FIRST OFFENDER -- BUT NOW I'M FORCED TO PRESS CHARGES.

SO MAC ROSS TURNED THE CASE OVER TO THE POLICE WHO CHARGED MYRA LANE WITH SHOPLIFTING...

WHO IS KRITCHNA?

The sport car stopped at the entrance to the garage. A well dressed man opened the door on the side and looked around for a mechanic. It was hard to tell the age of the driver. His skin was white and lineless. He might have been in his early thirties of forties. Offhand you would be ready to comment he must have led a life of ease. You could not spot the superbly trained athletic body that could spring into action in the fraction of a second. He noticed a mechanic.

"I would like to have arrangements made so that my car can occupy space in this garage," he said.

The mechanic picked up an oil can and walked closer to the man and the car.

"Sorry. We are all filled up. Why not try the Empire Garage down the street? Tell them we sent you. We are friendly competitors."

"But my car needs a special diet," continued the driver. "I must have vanilla ice cream, dates from Algeria, and whale meat."

"Some diet," replied the mechanic. "Drive onto the lift and up we go."

The man went behind the wheel and drove his car onto the garage life. The safety gate decended into place. The garage lift went up five flights. Then it stopped. A section of the wall moved aside. Two armed soldiers were on sentry duty.

"They are expecting you, sir," said the mechanic in an entirely different tone of voice. "The password will be changed at the end of the week."

The driver left his car in charge of the mechanic and followed one of the sentries to a door. The sentry knocked and then Colonel William B. Jameson, in charge of the counter-espionage, greeted his visitor.

"Come in. We tried to contact you for twenty-four hours. You are a man of a thousand different names and occupations. Who are you now?"

The visitor smiled and sat down on a large comfortable easy chair.

"Just now I am Henry Betts, an investment broker from Chicago. I am here on some business. What's up?"

Colonel William B. Jameson looked at America's leading counter-espionage agent and smiled.

"We have had a break in the missle case. We know that the Reds sent their top agent, Kritchna, here to try to get plans of the brain center of the new inter-continental missle. We leave for the plant at Crestwood at once."

"Some break," retorted Henry Betts. "We don't even have the slighest clue as to how Kritchna looks. If I wanted to write a song it might be entitled: Who is Kritchna? This much we do know at present. The Reds have also developed a long range guided missle, but we are ahead of them in the brain center. We can actually pin-point a target and the missle will make it. The Reds have to guide their missle. Let's get out to the Crestwood plant at once."

A group of windowless buildings with a 1A Security Priority made up the Crestwood plant of the Development Corporation. The Colonel and his top agent were walking through the main section of the plant. They were being shown things by Major Dennis Brown, in charge of security protection for the plants.

"So what if this top red agent is in this country," protested Major Brown. "Every man working on the brain center of the missile is a man we can trust. I am certain this Kritchna creature could never get to any of our people."

"In any chain there is a weak link," replied Henry Betts. "Under ordinary circumstances the weak link may never be tested nor detected. Kritchna's job is to find a weak link here and get the needed information."

"But we haven't a single weak link among the group working on the brain center of the missle," snapped back Major Brown.

There was no answer to that last retort. Henry Betts was eyeing carefully every man and woman he noticed. They walked to Major Brown's office.

"It would be very easy if I only knew who Kritchna was," admitted Henry Betts. "Then we could shadow him and he would lead us to the weak link, but we can reverse things. Look for your weak link and let him lead us to Kritchna.

I want to watch the scientists as they work on the brain center of the missle. From this moment on, I am Clifford Henderson of the Security Administration."

For the next four days, the man known as Clifford Henderson actually seemed to be in everybody's way. Even Dr. Alfred Pritcher protested to Major Brown.

"Why is he here? What does he want? He doesn't even talk to us. Is he spying on us?"

"That's a peculiar thing to say," shot back Major Brown. "All that concerns you is that he has the legal right to be where he wishes to be."

About two times a day there was a coffee break. A man in a white uniform would wheel a wagon around. The scientists then would help themselves to coffee, cream and sugar. There was also a little tray with cookies. While they drank their coffee the attendant would take time out for a smoke. Henry Betts watched the attendant carefully. Something was clicking in his mind. He returned to Major Brown's office.

"Get me the file on the coffee attendant," he said.

Major Brown went to the security file and returned with the information.

"Name is Frank Keerber. Works for the Magnum Coffee Company which has the coffee concession here. He is 27 years old and was checked out as o.k. by our agents. Lives at 78 Riverhead Road. Has a room in a boarding house at that place. He earns seventy dollars a week from the Magnum Coffee Company plus such tips as he may receive. Our report says he is a quiet pleasant man. Neither drinks nor gambles. What bothers you concerning him."

"Just the simple fact that he is really the only outsider who gets near to the scientists working on the brain center of the missle," was the reply.

"But he could see really nothing of value," pointed out Major Brown. "Let's be practical about it. Even a peep or two would never help anyone."

"But suppose he were able to photograph what was going on," said Henry Betts, "then he would be able to have valuable information. He comes in there about two times a day and remains for some fifteen minutes. With a micro-camera using the wide angle lens, he would be able to take pictures at a distance. Load up this camera with the new super-sensitive film and you need just plain ordinary light for your picture. He smokes and holds the cigarette case in one hand. Get him and the case. You'll have a surprise on your hands."

Twenty minutes later it was difficult to say who was more startled. Major Brown looking at the concealed micro-camera in the cigarette case or Frank Keerber.

"How much money were you to get for these films," asked Henry Betts.

"A million dollars," replied the man. "I have delivered thirty of these films already. For each film I received twenty-thousand dollars in five and ten dollar bills. Look, I realize I am caught. What can I do?"

"Help us catch the man behind all this," said Henry Betts. "That's the least you can do. We are going to let you continue taking the rest of the films. We will shadow you and the man who caused you to betray your country. You will be punished."

For the next two weeks Frank Keerber continued to take the pictures. One thing he did learn: The money given to him was counterfeit! And another thing penetrated his mind: How terrible it is to supply information to a foreign agent and betray your own country.

On a Thursday afternoon, a middle-aged business man boarded a plane whose destination was Paris. This man had walked down a narrow corridor from the ticket office that lead to the field. The main entrance had been blocked that day. The name of this man was Thomas K. Linton. A month later, Major Brown, Colonel Jomeson, and Henry Betts sat around a table.

"I don't get it yet," said Major Brown. "You knew that Thomas K. Linton had all those films concealed in his luggage. Why was he permitted to go abroad with them?"

"Because they were useless and destroyed," laughed Colonel Jameson. "When he walked down that narrow corridor there was a concealed X-ray machine. The x-rays ruined the films, and they also ruined Thomas K. Linton alias Kritchna. We know that Kritchna has vanished from the Red scene."

And America's leading counter-espionage agent held up his two fingers to make the sign of V, the V of Victory of Democracy over Communism.
